A: Let me preface this by saying that I don't own the product, nor do I have any involvement with the developers. The license key is the sum of its six distinct parts, each of which must match a particular software product. If you want to use the software with an old version, you have to buy a license for the old version. Buying a new version is free, as long as you keep the old version as well. The license key in this case is 7, since it must fit in the following format: 7=RTAS, 1=Mac OS, 0=Windows. You did not provide the license key, so I can't confirm if your license is valid. Make sure to keep it with you at all times while using the software. In any case, since the serial number is on the license itself, you should be able to use the same serial number with any version. That is, you can use any license and license key combination, as long as it's within the limitations of the original license (i.e. you must have the original license to use a new license). You can get an Apple ID to use the license for other Apple products by contacting Apple (or your distributor). If you are still concerned that the serial number will not match, you can change the serial number on any license to a different one. You can use the license key to activate your product on multiple platforms, since the key is valid for any platform. Your serial number identifies your product uniquely to the vendor, and even to the user (so you cannot resell the serial number). That's why the serial number is not allowed to be shared. You'll have to contact the vendor to find out if the serial number is unique to them, or whether it can be repurchased. If you would like to know more about the licensing, please refer to the original license. // // detail/resolve_op.hpp // ~~~~~ //
